Dear George 3/19/91

Thank you for your prompt response.

The area which I've marked on the enclosed map ~~has~~ is an actual area for sea turtles.

This is the 1st animal which I've seen in this area with tumors.

At first the turtle appeared lifeless, just lying on the bottom.

There are several areas on the south shore of Maui with turtle populations.

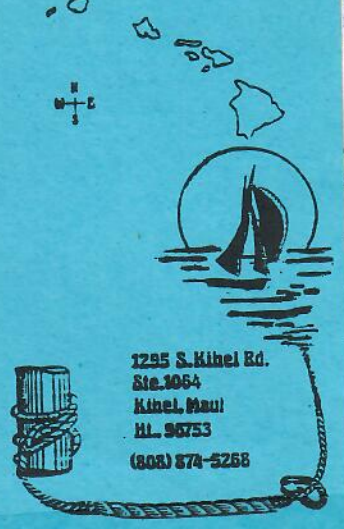

I will keep an eye open when in these areas and send you 3x5 cards

Sincerely,
Richard

Dear George -

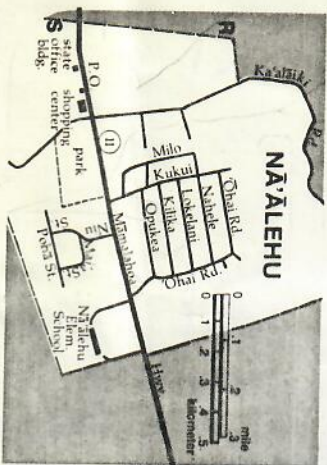

Black?

After talking with everyone who saw and helped the turtle most agreed that it was a green turtle - according to the pictures you sent. It was on a sandy beach with about a 20° incline. Half of the observers thought that the turtle might have turned over trying to climb over some lava rock flows that were located nearby and the other half tend to believe that someone turned it over to trap it keep it on the beach so that they could return later to butcher it. No one really could say for sure. There were crawl or "drag" marks up the shore line to where the turtle was and he had ~~dragged~~ dug a lot of sand up with his flippers while on his back. I say "he" loosely because no one knew the turtle's sex. Everyone agreed that the turtle was quite heavy although there is no firm estimate on weight but it was in the hundreds of pounds. It required quite a few (four) people to turn the turtle over because it put up quite a fight! Throwing sand around.

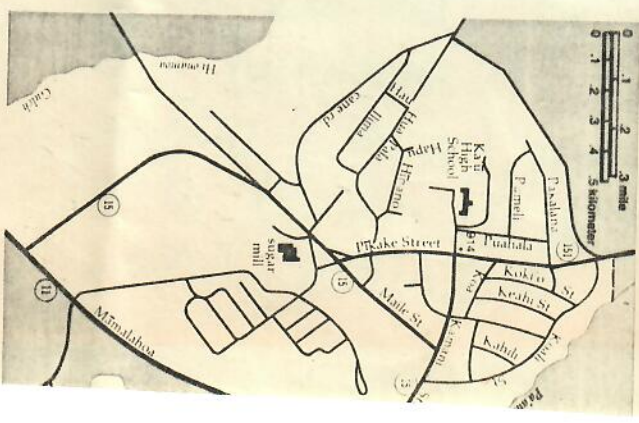

The turtle made it back to the ocean safely with the pushing of the men - No eggs or other unusual things were spotted. I have circled the area that everyone agreed on on your map. Although it is not listed, one of the guys said that Kamehame Hill was located near the sighting along with an abandoned fishing village -

If we spot anymore, I certainly will pay more attention to the details and send the information to you. I hope we have been of some help. The word has been passed to the National Guard pilots and crews to be on the lookout! I hope we dig up more sightings!!

Sincerley,
Kimo Bao
