Investigation by the Port of Nagoya Aquarium, etc. Is sea turtle affected by changes in seawater temperature?

Jun 20 17:58

A research group including the Port of Nagoya Public Aquarium will start investigating how changes in seawater temperature affect the ecology of loggerhead turtles, which are in danger of extinction, from July.

Loggerhead turtles live in temperate and tropical regions around the world, and are designated as an endangered species by the International Union for Conservation of Nature.

In a survey starting in July, the aquarium will work with researchers from the United States, New Zealand, and other countries to release loggerhead turtles with small transmitters attached to their shells in the central North Pacific to track their positions.

Previous research has revealed that after hatching in Japan, they migrate along the Kuroshio Current in the central North Pacific, where food is abundant.

The research group hypothesizes that loggerhead turtles can reach the west coast of North America due to the El Niño phenomenon, which raises the sea temperature from the equator to South America, and plans to investigate the detailed route.

Masanori Kurita, director of the Nagoya Port Aquarium, said, "I want to clarify how climate change affects the ecology of loggerhead sea turtles. I want people to be interested in the global environment by drawing attention to my research."
